It's not something you hear too often these days: a company with more job openings than it can fill and some of those positions pay one $100,000 a year. "We have been growing significantly and just to fill those jobs to get that work done is part of the challenge," said President and CEO Bob Roberts. "But the other part of the challenge, the regional challenge, is a lot of people have left the area when times were tough and what we're trying to do is attract them to come back." The catch is, you need to be an expert in your field, from engineering to software development to environmental science. Syracuse Research Corporation is one of many high-tech companies bucking the recession. Since 2002, the 52 year old company has more than doubled its number of employees. Check out its website, and you'll find 92 job openings, and Roberts says there are plenty more.

A big focus at SRC is hiring Central New Yorkers and keeping them here. This weekend, the research company is launching an ad campaign to coax people home for the holidays and stay here. "We are donating money to Onondaga Community College to make sure the best and brightest engineers can stay in Central New York," said Technical Recruiter Judson Vann. "Once they move on from O.C.C. they can go to other schools and hopefully come to us with their 4 year degree." If you'd like to see if you qualify for any of the positions, you can check SRC's website at www.srcinc.com.
